ReadCountCraftdotcom holds both physical and intellectual copywrite to this material. I'm writing on an Ebook which uses this principle embedded into the framework of building a schedule based on brain cycles.

Manage Time and project balance with your time pyramid

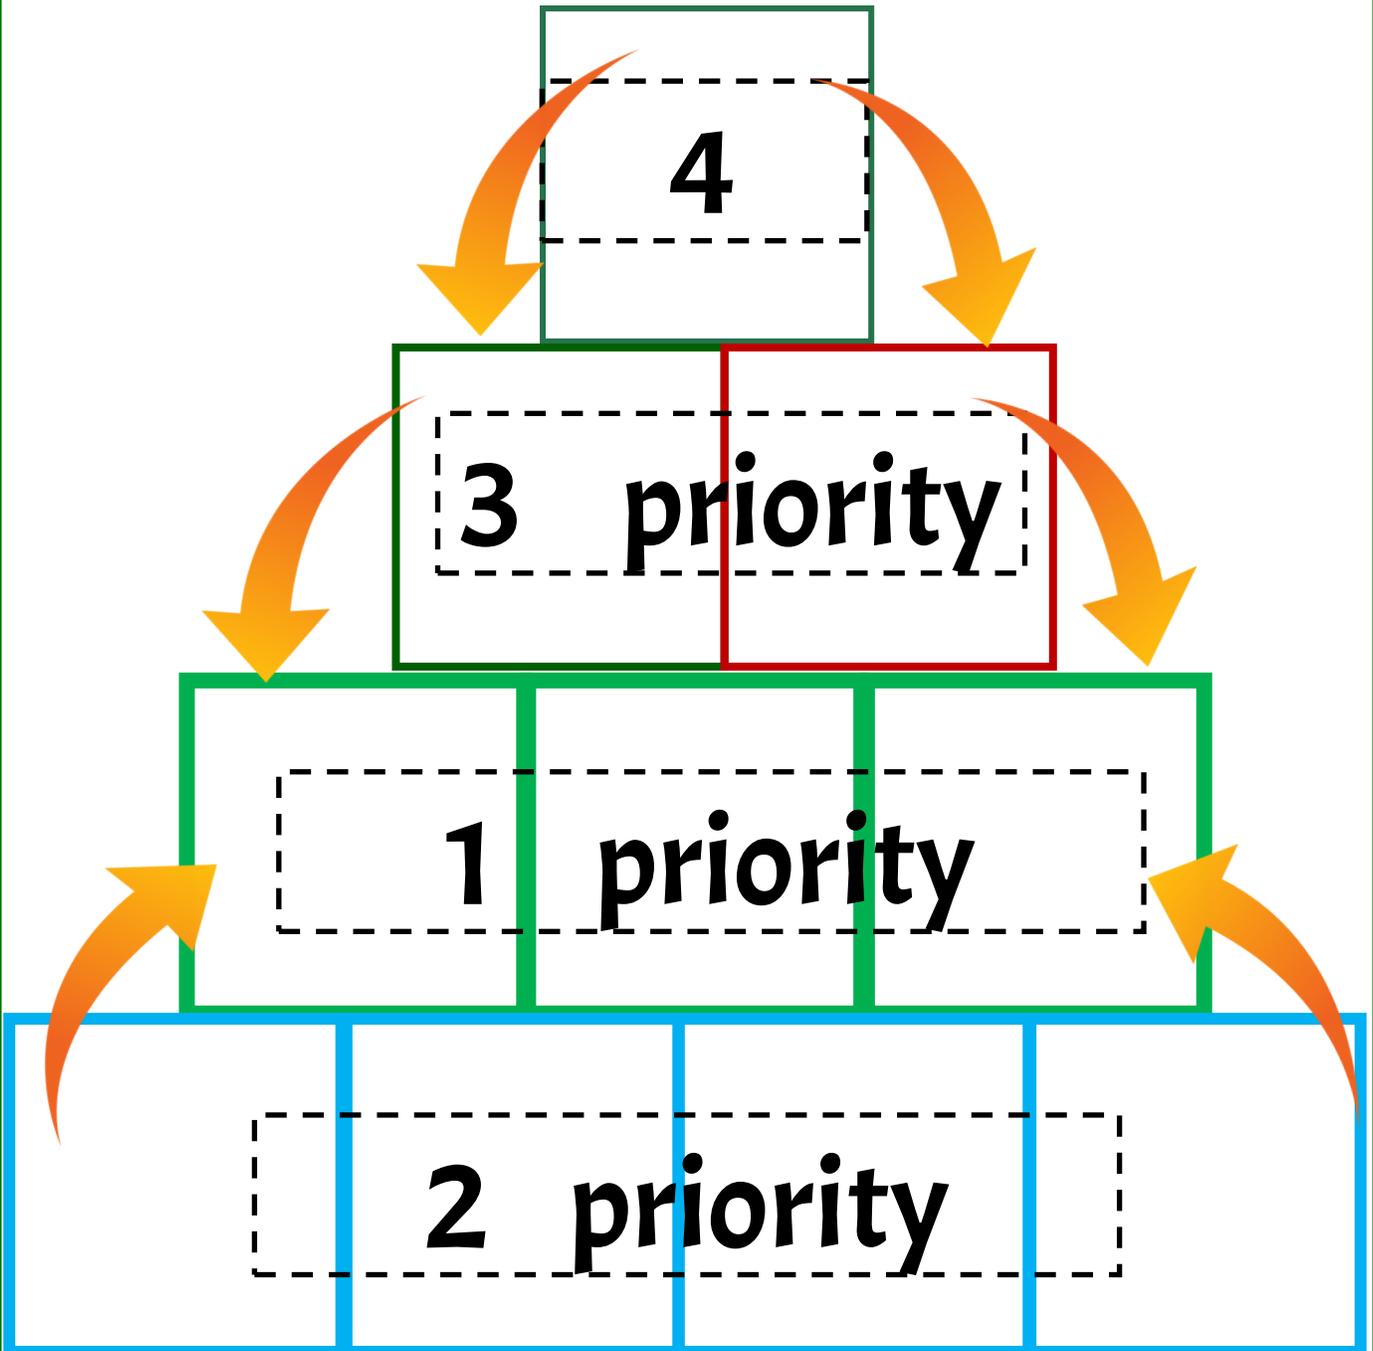

Remember building a structure with Legos, or observing kids building with Legos? When we build with Legos we use the same basic foundation for every building but we change out other pieces to change the STYLE of the building? This is the analogy for the Pyramid Time Management plan.

1. Fill in your MAIN 3 priorities for the day in the 3 block row
2. Set your NEXT 4 priorities for the week in the 4 block row. These get moved UP into the 3 block row as the main priorities are checked off.
3. Set the NEXT 2 priorities in the 2 block row. These are priorities that you may fill in if you have time after your other priorities. These get moved down into your 3 block row as other tasks are completed.
4. Set the final priority in the 1 block row, the very top block. This is the last priority to move down as a priority as block tasks are completed.

I came up with and implemented this time management concept after much practice and application. I have to balance content I make for bloggers and my own passive/direct income. I was unable to expand into regular blogging and my Etsy shop, until I came up with a time management system. Ideally its better to blog daily? However, my principle has always been consistency and growth.
